Biographical / Historical

Charles Dudley Warner (1829-1900) was a prolific writer and editor, writing numerous books and articles, and was the first president of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. He is best remembered as Mark Twain's close friend, and only- co-author. He and Twain collaborated to write The Gilded Age: A Tale of Today (1873). On the editorial staff at Harper's Bazaar, he was the writer of the influential "Editor's Study" column for Harper's from 1894-1898.

Content Description

This collection contains twenty-six leaves of Charles Dudley Warner's manuscript of "The Study" for "The Editor's Study" in Harper's Bazaar. The manuscript contains the first two parts of Warner's essay published in Volume 95, October 1897 [pp. 798-800]. The text appears identical to the published version. It is likely that this was the manuscript submitted to Harper's - though there are minor authorial corrections throughout.

It is laid in a three piece green and crimson gilt-decorated Morocco slip-case, made by the Adams Bindery in New York and is signed by Warner on the final page. Part I is both a negative review of Edward Bellamy's Utopian novel, Equality (1897), and a rebuttal of Bellamy's socialist ideas. Part II is an extended critique of contemporary children's literature.
