Conditions Governing Use

An independent student organization published the Barrister yearbook. They own the copyright to any content that is not yet in the public domain or was licensed from another party. Individuals who wish to re-publish copyright-protected content will need to seek permission from the party or parties that own it.

Immediate Source of Acquisition

In the spring of 1983, Eleanor Kett transferred these materials to the University of Virginia Law Library.

Biographical / Historical

Between 1888 and 2009, law students at the University of Virginia documented their experiences in yearbooks. The books, edited by the students, contain photographs and short articles that identify members of the law school community and provide glimpses into everyday student life.

From 1888 to 1955, "Corks and Curls," the University of Virginia's main yearbook, contained sections dedicated to the law school. Then, in 1956, law students began to annually produce their own yearbook called "The Barrister." For a brief time between 1982 and 1991, law students once again collaborated with the editors of "Corks and Curls" to publish special "Barrister Editions" of that yearbook. These editions contain both specific content documenting the Law School and other content documenting student life at the wider university.

In 1992, UVA law students revived "The Barrister" as an independent publication. Then, after a decade of declining student interest in the yearbooks, "The Barrister" ended its run in 2009. Between 1992 and 2009, there were some years when students did not produce an edition of "The Barrister."
