Scope and Contents Four photocopies of photographs of groups of Williamsburg residents. Some of the people were identified during a Spring 2011 WHRA meeting. Two women holding their sleepy children, probably during a Common Glory presentation at the amphitheater. Five men and one woman at the "Food Handler School" standing in front of possibly Matthew Whaley. Principal Pitts, a math teacher, is identified. Four men standing in front of a Red Cross "clock" with a group of children behind them. The men are identified as Vincent D. McManus, Dewey C. Renick, Thomas G. McCaskey and Horace E. Henderson. Groups of students sitting at tables in the Matthew Whaley School library. A few possible identifications include a Bell twin, Tommy Singleton and Howard Martin.

One of Williamsburg's Most Historical Buildings is the Colonial Capitol where virginia's General Assembly convened from 1704 to 1780. Here an embarrassed and stammering George Washington was applauded by fellow burgesses for his part in the French and Indian War; here Patrick Henry defiantly protested the Stamp Act until accused of treason; and here George Mason's Virginia Declaration of Rights was passed. The Public Hospital was America's First Public Institution Devoted Exclusively to the Care and Treatment of the Mentally Ill. With the completion of the hospital, Colonial Williamsburg has reconstructed the last of the 18th-century capital city's major public buildings. In the 18th century, the hospital was the last public building constructed prior to the outbreak of the American Revolution in town. It grew from this original building to a complex of many before it burned on the night of June 7, 1885. (large-sized photo)

Two studies regarding the location of Fort James on Jamestown Island prior to its discovery by William Kelso. In a 1983 unpublished study, archaeologist Ivor Noel Hume offers a "reexamination of the documentary and interpretive evidence" for the Jamestown-Yorktown Foundation, and suggests it may be downstream. Virginia S. Harrington, a historian and archaeologist, presents "Theories and Evidence for the Location of James Fort" in an article published in The Virginia Magazine (date not noted), suggests two possible locations.
